We focus on the protection of animals from all forms of cruelty, suffering and abuse across the globe. In this study was surprising, as we would expect a reduced cell density in the liver to be accompanied by a reduced release of hepatocyte-derived EVs, due to the impact of increased cellular volume on the intracellular content of liver-derived EVs. However, by avoiding the use of freeze/thaw steps, our EV isolation procedure may have facilitated the diffusion of cytoplasmic components out of the liver cells, resulting in a reduction in the amounts of liver-derived EVs in the plasma. Indeed, this phenomenon was previously reported in the case of the use of centrifugation-based EV isolation methods ([@B22]). Therefore, if an assay does not involve the use of freeze/thaw steps, the gradient centrifugation method we used should be preferred. Another advantage of our optimized protocol is the improved size and quantity of EVs recovered, as they were 1.2- and 3-fold higher, respectively, than in the original protocol. This improvement of size and quantity could be the result of the added sample dilution and also of the lower ultracentrifugation speed used for the second ultracentrifugation, which was around four times slower than the first ultracentrifugation in the original protocol. An optimized protocol, with no freeze/thaw steps, may allow for a better reproducibility of the results obtained with a particular EV isolation method. In this study, the physical characteristics of liver-derived EVs were monitored during the entire protocol. Liver-derived EVs were found to be heterogeneous, as the average particle diameter of the population was about 130 nm, and about 70% of the particles were in the range of 50--200 nm. In agreement with previous reports, EVs derived from the various cell types in the plasma can be fractionated into subpopulations of EVs ([@B34]). Different size EVs appear in the same fraction when subjected to ultracentrifugation, and each size fraction can be further subfractionated by sucrose density-gradient ultracentrifugation ([@B34], [@B33]). Thus, the heterogeneity of EVs is a crucial determinant for their separation
